- ff.52v-53v and 73v-92v In unidentified hands.

Biographical / Historical:

Benjamin Robert Haydon's posthumously published diaries demonstrated his interest in society and culture at the time, including considerations regarding slavery and abolitionism.

The term "Negro" was adopted and preferred by members of the Black community starting in the latter half of the nineteenth century, becoming dominant in language in the United States by the 1950s. As the Civil Rights movement developed, the term was criticized for being imposed upon the Black community by white people, and a new term to self-identify was sought. By the mid-1960s, more progressive language shifted to the preference for the word "Black," with some arguing that "Black" referred to radical, progressive figures, while "Negro" was used for those who were "established" or more in keeping "with the status quo." (See Citation below.) Black grew in popularity over the latter half of the twentieth century and is the contemporarily preferred term at the time of writing (2024). The inclusion of the term "Negro" in this description is in keeping with the establishment usage, particularly by white Americans such as Georgina Lowell in the early twentieth century.

Processing Information:

This item was revised in December 2023 to address outdated and harmful descriptive language. During that revision, contextualizing processing notes were added to the description of this item, though a full understanding of Haydon's relationship to slavery and abolitionism could not be interpreted.
